

4.3.1 Text selection

The following conditions apply to the texts chosen:

- students must study one prose and one poetry text
- set texts listed for the A-level exam components cannot be used for non-exam assessment, even if they will not be used in the exam.

All texts must be suitable for A-level study and should reflect the quality of the texts used for the exams. It is important that students are able to cover all of the assessment objectives while studying the text.

The poetry text could be either one longer narrative poem or a single authored collection of shorter poems. If using a collection of poetry and writing a conventional response, students must have studied the whole text and select at least two poems to write about in detail as examples of the wider collection. If using a selection of poetry and writing a re-creative response, students must have studied the whole text and will choose an appropriate part of the base text as the focus for their re-creative piece, and thus it is acceptable to focus on a single poem.

Single authored collections of short stories are permissible. If using a collection of short stories, students must have studied the whole text and select at least two stories to write about in detail as examples of the wider collection. If using a collection of short stories and writing a re-creative response, students must have studied the whole text and will choose an appropriate part of the base text as the focus for their re-creative piece, and thus it is acceptable to focus on a single short story.

Texts chosen for study may include one text in translation that has been influential and significant in the development of literature in English. The translated text should be treated as the original writer's own words for assessment purposes. Therefore, schools and colleges should ensure that they use a version recognised by academia as being a high quality translation which supports the original author's writing appropriately.
