

B: Writing about a topical language issue This section focuses on an issue or concept related to language in use. Engaging with a variety of texts and contexts in Section A will help to prepare learners to emulate these styles in this section.	Learners should present and explore their ideas and attitudes towards language issues through short pieces of original writing. Learners should be encouraged to engage with a range of topical language issues in the course of their studies. They should develop the skills needed to critically explore such issues, evaluating and responding to the underlying attitudes towards language and language users. In writing about topical issues, learners should be given a real-world purpose, form and audience, and their writing should be shaped to match the genre, mode and context specified.	• show critical understanding of issues and concepts relevant to language use • critically evaluate attitudes towards language and its users • demonstrate how texts and discourses are shaped in different genres, modes and contexts • apply critical and creative skills in the production of texts and discourses.
